AFTER ENLIGHTENMENT, WHAT?

by Tara

Assessing, desiring, like and dislike, seemingly innocent, are the words that will put you right back in the story . . . (and in the soup,) if you will.

When one enters into desiring, even if for a noble cause, such as 'the Enlightenment of the world', one has, in fact, reentered the world of samsara.

After that, It's all up for grabs. If you continue to entertain curiosity, desires, helping and changing, testing or trying on Truths found, well, there you go again . . . as a new life and story is entered in.

See Archives for previous entrees of this book, and the book; Enlightenment.*

Samsara - the world in its cycles of change; the source of all suffering said to be due to avoidance and desiring in a world of constant change between the poles of duality. The primary one being life and death.*

Samara has many refinements of definition. A loosely held popular definition might be the ups and downs of feeling and experience within a world of changes, desires and avoidances.*

A thought of the day in passing . . .

The way is the goal.

On this days except from AFTER ENLIGHTENMENT, WHAT? . . .

One's soul will be upheld in the end certainly, but not necessarily the ego-personality. This is a subtle and important distinction about the life after Enlightenment.

Truth is, a full Enlightenment is a new beginning, and while putting it into practice seems the obvious next step and teaching it the third; there will generally, be fresh learning in all aspects and levels of one's being no matter what one does after. So, some may choose not 'bringing it back' nor putting it into practice, neither teaching it; but rather save such for another life and 'sit it out' for the remainder of this one, or make some different choice . . .

Sometimes . . . it's not about the life.

After a full Enlightenment the essential fact is: one gets to choose and create, whereas prior to it, such was minimal, if at all.
